The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) HIV educational materials review guidelines requires that materials developed with CDC funds may not be used to provide education or information designated to promote encourage, directly, homosexual or heterosexual activity or intravenous substance use: programs of education and information receiving [CDC] funds...shall include information about the harmful effects of promiscuous sexual activity and intravenous substance abuse, and the benefits of abstaining from such activities and; materials provide accurate information about various activities in which attendees participate in sexually suggestive physical contact or actual sexual practices.*

To comply with these requirements please review the attached materials accordingly:

Are materials designed to directly promote or encourage sexual activity or intravenous substance use?			Do materials include information about harmful effects of risky sexual activity and intravenous substance use, and the benefits of abstaining from such activities?			Do materials provide accurate information about the various means to reduce an individual's risk of exposure to or transmission of HIV?			Does the potential for preventing HIV infection outweigh any potential to offend?			Is there scientific proof cited in the cover letter submitted by the agency indicating that this strategy has been proven to be effective?
